Money Laundering Laws in Utah

If you've been charged with money laundering, you're being accused of knowingly receiving or transporting money or assets gained through illegal means, making proceeds gained through illegal means available to others, concealing or promoting unlawful activity, or making transactions to avoid reporting requirements in Utah.

If you've been accused of money laundering, it means that you've knowingly done something illegal for personal or business financial gain. Often, money laundering crimes involve portraying illegally gained funds as legitimate business income.

In Utah, money laundering is a felony offense. The greater the offense, the more severe the penalty. A money laundering charge that only involves a few hundred dollars of profit carries less weight than a felony charge that involves a great degree of profit, or that involves law enforcement.

Consequences You Could Face if Found Guilty of Money Laundering in Utah

Consequences for money laundering in Utah can be serious and may range from probation to fines to more than a decade of jail time. Aggravating factors include money laundering that involves law enforcement, laundering a large amount of money, or having several money laundering charges. Mitigating factors can include being a first-time offender, having excellent relationships with family and the community, and playing a more passive role in the crime than others who were involved.
