Reckless Driving Consequences in Utah

It is so easy to get charged with reckless driving, and misdemeanors in Utah carry a punishment of up to one year in local or county jail and/or court fines, as well as a criminal record. An individual who violates Utah Code § 41-6a-528 is guilty of a class B. misdemeanor. Reckless driving is considered a traffic offense committed in two ways; the first, a willful disregard for the welfare of individuals or property, and the second way you could commit reckless driving is if you commit three or more moving traffic offenses in a sequence of acts taking place within a continuous driving period covering a total distance of 3 miles or less.

The explanation of reckless driving is very ambiguous. What one individual may think through as unruly or malicious disregard may be very diverse from what another individual may think. Similarly, what may be unruly or malicious disregard in one scenario might not be in another. This means reckless driving charges can be challenged in court built on the situations at the time the offense was supposedly committed.

Some common examples of actions that may constitute reckless driving include:

- Driving too fast for safety in poor weather conditions
- Driving under the influence
- Excessive speeding
- Refusing to stop at a stop sign

- Speeding up to run a red light
- Ignoring a police officer's directives to pull over
- Ignoring the right of way which can cause an intersection accident

The Utah Driver License Point System

Utah gives points for moving traffic offenses established on the connection between accidents and violations.

Getting more than 200 points on your driving record in a three-year span may result in your driving privileges being put on hold. Nevertheless, you can clear your record if you drive cautiously. Half of the points can be removed on your driving record if you drive one year without being found guilty of a violation of moving traffic. All points on your score will be removed if you drive without a moving traffic offense in 2 years. By attending a course in defensive driving, you get 50 points off your driving record once in a period of three-years.
